Processes of media transformation are of central concern in the arts, in popular culture, and in the media industry as well as media studies. The Hamburg-based research group Framing and Translating: Practices of Medial Transformations uses an innovative praxeological approach, by conceptualizing perception and appropriation as forms of “translating” and “framing.” The aim is to build on existing theories toward an expanded media studies, combining research on the arts, media and cultural studies, as well as the social sciences. The interdisciplinary group, established in 2015, consists of seven research projects led by scholars of Universität Hamburg and the Hochschule für Bildende Künste Hamburg (HFBK).

The second international conference brings together scholars and practitioners working in philosophy, media, and performance and cultural studies whose interventions focus on dynamic processes of cultural transformation in a global context. Taking as our starting point the notion that culture is produced in an ongoing, reciprocal process of framing and translation, we have specifically invited contributions that broaden existing concepts of framing and translating, for instance, by focusing on such diverse phenomena as inter-medial and cross-cultural translations and hybridizations. The spectrum covers a broad range of media including the body and its movement, voice, literature, film, web series, and graphic novels. Pushing beyond traditional notions of media production and reception, we are asking instead in what ways are media not only always already framed and translated expressions of specific, mostly Western cultures, but what other, non-Western and frequently unseen and unheard ways of framing and translating are there?

Elisabeth (Lisa) El Refaei is Senior Lecturer at the Centre for Language and Communication Research, Cardiff University, UK. The main focus of her research is on visual/multimodal forms of metaphor and narrative in alternative comics. She is currently writing a research monograph on visual metaphors in graphic narratives about the experience of physical or mental illness, as well as being involved with a pilot study that explores the use of drawing workshops as a way of investigating and disded in 2016 by Ahmed Ansari, Danah Abdulla, Ece Canlı, Luiza Prado, Mahmoud Keshavarz, Matt Kiem, Pedro Oliveira and Tristan Schultz. The group aims to contribute to a systematic, rather than additive, change in design discourse and praxis; it does not aim to offer an alternative perspective on design, but to question the very foundations upon which the discipline was established. In order to foster these discussions the group launched the De-colonising Design platform in 2016, as a plural space in which ideas can be nurtured and made public, and reflections about the nature of designerly knowledge can emerge outside the confines of traditional, Anglo- and Eurocentric systems of knowledge and institutions.
